

Each year at the end of the hunting season these animals suffer a systematic mass murder as more than 50,000 of them are being run over, burned alive or hanged. Sometimes they are shot and presumed dead, and their agony lasts for weeks until they die.

The more clumsy galgos suffer a cruel punishment: they are hanged from a rope that allows their paws to almost touch the ground so they desperately scramble for a foothold until they are overcome with exhausting and die strangled.

The “useful” galgos are being bred and kept under extremely cramped conditions: they are kept in holes or stables, fed bread and water, not checked by a veterinarian, carelessly, and mistreated continuously.

In Europe, hunting with greyhounds is forbidden due to the damages done to the environment to and forest animals, the unnecessary cruelty inflicted on the hunted game, and the threat that the greyhound, a natural predator, poses for certain other animals during the hunt.
